I 次の文を読んで、後の設問に答えなさい。

It was 8:30 a.m. on August 6, 1978. After a journey of twenty-four hours, an airplane landed at Kathmandu airport in Nepal. On the plane was a group of eleven women. They were all very excited but also a little afraid, as they had flown from America to climb one of the highest, most dangerous mountains in the world. The name of the mountain was Annapurna.

The leader of the group was Arlene Blum, an American mountaineer with many years of experience climbing high mountains. For her, this day was the result of two years of planning. She smiled as she walked down the steps of the plane and saw the Nepalese newspaper-men running up to her.

“Why do you want to climb Annapurna? Why all women?” they asked her.

These were the same questions Arlene had asked herself a thousand times during the past few difficult months. Now that she was here the answers seemed simpler than before. “This mountain is 8,000 meters high, and if we succeed we’ll be the first Americans and the first women to climb Annapurna. And why all women? Because we all love climbing high, and we want to give women the chance to climb one of the world’s highest mountains.”

As she left the plane and walked toward the airport buildings, Arlene remembered how it had all started. The idea of climbing Annapurna had first come to her when she was in the Himalayas in 1976. The beautiful Annapurna seemed a perfect mountain to climb, though not at all easy.
