V 次の英文を読んで、後の設問に答えなさい。

One quarter of all Americans have recently taken a pay cut to make their lives simpler. This usually means they can spend more time with family and friends. However, some have decided to leave the city and move to the state of Maine, USA. Land there is still reasonable, and if one works hard at farming, one can make a living. The number of farmers under 35 years old in Maine has increased by 40% in recent years as compared to 1.5% in other parts of the USA. Young farmers care a lot about the environment. They want to produce food without chemicals.

These modern farmers believe that happiness is not about how much money a person makes. They think happiness is about community and a simple life. Something called the “back-to-the-land movement” started with Scott Nearing and his wife Helen in the 1930s. Nearing saw chasing money as an empty goal. It seemed the more money people got, the more they wanted. He and his wife came to Maine in the 1950s.

Later, young people in the late 60s and 70s followed his ideas naturally. They did not want the same city life as their parents, so many started farming. It seemed romantic, but it was hard work. Many were surprised how much time it took simply to heat the house or prepare dinner. By the time the great economy of the 1980s arrived, many farmers left for company jobs in the city and the life they had tried to avoid.

No one knows how long today’s movement will last. While city life often satisfies needs for safety and security, time has shown that the values of community and the simple life often attract those who live in big cities.
