V 次の英文を読んで、後の設問に答えなさい。

Everyone is searching for happiness, but what is it? After interviewing over one hundred people in the United States about the meaning of happiness, one thing became clear. No two answers were exactly the same. Happiness means something different to everyone. There were, however, common themes to the answers.

The first thing that happy people had in common is that they had good relationships. These personal relationships were usually in the form of family relationships. Most had good marriages and communicated well with their children and grandchildren. Those without families had several close friends and felt that they belonged to a community. Happiness seems to lie in our connection to others more than anything else.

Just as important was good physical and mental health. Happy elderly people were able to exercise without too much pain. It is also true that people who exercised more felt they had a more positive outlook on life. Clearly, physical activity and mental well-being are connected, so it is best to find a balance between work and exercise.

Money was not such an issue. Happy people did have enough to live, but being rich did not make people happier. Having a meaningful job was more important. When people believed their work had purpose, they felt happier. A high salary was not nearly as important.

The final thing we found was the most surprising: people are happier if they can appreciate beauty in art and nature. This can take many forms. While going to a museum may be best for some, others would rather go hiking and experience nature. Still others play or listen to music. All of these have been proven to increase happiness.

Most people experience some unhappiness in their lives, and few people are happy in every way. Still, we can learn from others who have lived long lives. These ideas can be seen as a road map to happiness, and even if you take a wrong turn, it is never too late to get back on track.
